

Sharing Your Message

Working with the Media

The benefits of implementing an intentional, ongoing public relations effort can provide your organization with a host of benefits. It can attract allies and sway public opinion, grow a donor base, result in positive promotion, raise awareness about your work, and establish your credibility in the community.¹

Sharing the T.E.A.C.H. Story

Tapping the power of the media to tell your T.E.A.C.H. story is vital to both sustaining and growing T.E.A.C.H. in your state.

Everybody has a story. Your organization has a story to tell too, a real story about the women and children you impact every day. Review evaluations, gather ideas from T.E.A.C.H. counselors, and collect recipient quotes to build a story.

Then get ready to share your story with the press. First seek permission and/or collect a consent form from all individuals featured. Once your story is ready to share...

- build a press kit and/or online packet, and prepare a news release,²
- outline expected questions and be prepared to answer them³, and
- plan distribution – from organization newsletters to social networking forums online.

Resources about how to build a plan for sharing your stories can be found online, through nonprofit support groups, campus libraries, small business centers and more. Utilizing sample resources such as those provided here can support you in building a strong media connection, telling a riveting story, making your web site media friendly, communicating clearly with the press, and more.
